When the story of Plateau State is told, it is impossible to overlook the rich cultural heritage of its indigenous people. Among them stands the Anaguta people, one of the original inhabitants of Jos, whose history, traditions, and values continue to contribute to the identity and beauty of the Plateau.

Anaguta people, known as the people of the bow and arrow, have long been recognized for their resilience, communal spirit, and deep connection to their land. Their culture is expressed through traditional music (Turetu), dance, attire, storytelling, and festivals (Ishokori, Upuri, Tikan, Tisandaka and others) that celebrate both heritage and community. These traditions have been preserved through generations and remain a source of pride for the people today.

In a rapidly changing world, preserving indigenous culture has become more important than ever. Across communities, a new generation of Anaguta sons and daughters is embracing the responsibility of documenting history, promoting cultural awareness, and ensuring that valuable traditions are not forgotten. Through cultural events, storytelling, photography, digital media, and initiatives such as Anaguta Tradomodern, efforts are being made to connect the past with the future.

The strength of Plateau State lies in its diversity. Each ethnic group contributes a unique thread to the rich cultural fabric that makes the state remarkable. The Anaguta people proudly add their voice to this collective identity, reminding us that culture is not merely a memory of the past but a foundation for the future.

As we celebrate The Pride of Plateau, we celebrate not only landscapes and landmarks but also the people, traditions, and stories that define our heritage. The Anaguta people remain a proud part of that story—a living testament to the beauty, resilience, and cultural richness that make Plateau State truly exceptional.
